National Anti-Corruption Commissioner Paul Brereton has resigned from the role, following persistent questions about his suitability and performance in overseeing the accountability body.

The resignation comes a day before Brereton is due to appear in front of the Senate Estimates hearing into legal and constitutional affairs.

When Greens Senator David Shoebridge asked Attorney-General's Department Secretary Katherine Jones about the development, she revealed she had missed the initial notification as Brereton's resignation letter was sent to the wrong email address.

Comments from Anthony Whealy in the Age:

"We can't trust the government to choose their own watchdogs," he said.

"There are now two vacancies in the NACC that must be filled following an independent, transparent merit-based appointments process, to restore public trust in that institution. Parliament's oversight role in the process needs to be properly respected. Ideally, we would see legislated reforms to ensure these things."

The payment was made under a regulation that enables current and former Commonwealth parliamentarians to apply for financial assistance for "legal representation, disbursements and adverse costs" related to eligible matters under the NACC's governing legislation.
